Railroad Roundhouses, see the larger image of the card on the first page:

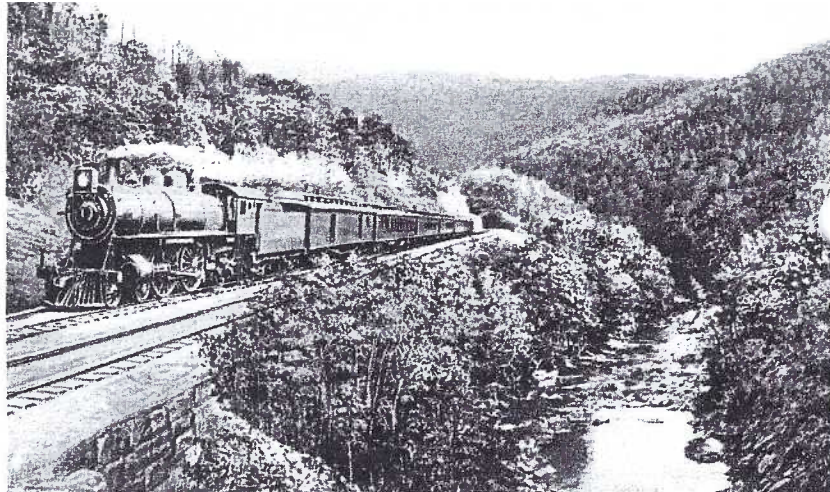

Locomotive servicing facilities provided a place to fuel, water, sand, lubricate, wash and turn locomotives. Steam engines also required a place to dump ashes and clean fires. During the steam era, routine repairs and general maintenance were usually handled in buildings which contained tracks which radiated off the turntable used to turn locomotives. Such buildings were either completely round or semi-circular and therefore called roundhouses. The term roundhouse was often used to refer to the entire servicing facility and consequently a name such as the Charles Street roundhouse usually referred to the area that included a coaling tower, water tank, ash pits, etc. Diesel-electric locomotives had distinctive but similar requirements, and facilities designed for steam engines were often adapted to service diesels.
